The white lighthouse on St Mary's Island, a small tidal island, was built in 1898 and operated until 1984. The shore crab is the most common crab on UK shores. Normally a greenish colour, but often yellowish-orange or red, shore crabs are found in rockpools and shallow waters. They will eat anything – seaweed, mussels, barnacles and even smaller crabs.

In spring, bluebells stand out in a dazzling array of colour on the slopes of Roseberry Topping. This distinctive conical outcrop owes its peculiar bent profile to a geological fault and a landslide caused by over-mining of minerals in the early 20th century. The pretty roe deer is Britain's smallest, most common native deer. Reddy-brown with a white rump, short antlers and no tail.

estbury is the White Horse chalk hill figure, probably first cut in the late 17th century. The chalk males are most conspicuous as they fly around searching for the more secretive, brown females.

Wicken Fen nature reserve supports a huge diversity of wildlife – around 8,020 species flourish in the rich peat soil of the Sedge Fen. There are several hides overlooking the Mere to view water birds. Native to southern Britain, the bittern, with its tawny mottled plumage, moves silently through the reed beds, on which it depends for survival. When alarmed it stands frozen, upright.

The Roaches are a jagged gritstone escarpment offering superb views of North Staffordshire, Derbyshire and the distant Cheshire plain, part of the prominent steep rocky ridge on the western edge of the Peak District. The fox, intelligent and very resourceful, is at home in this terrain. It is an opportunistic feeder with excellent hearing to allow it to hear small animals underground.

This hill is the site of an Iron Age hill-fort and a prominent landmark in the Chilterns, set in an area of wildflower-rich chalk grasslands and ancient woodlands spread across rolling hills. The red kite is often seen circling overhead. This graceful bird of prey with its unmistakable reddish-brown body, angled wings and deeply forked tail has now been successfully re-introduced to Britain.
